The S&P 500 and Nasdaq Composite posted positive gains again last week after having their nine-week winning streak snapped. The Nasdaq led the way as Nvidia and Meta Platforms rose more than 11 percent and 6 percent, respectively. Mega-cap names led the way as yields lowered. The move to mega-caps can be seen as a “flight to safety” despite valuations.

The belly of the curve between the 2 and 10-year Treasury maturities fell as investors continue to be concerned about global growth; they are pricing in a 76 percent chance of a rate cut in March. The 2-year yield fell 20 basis points (bps) as investors expect the Federal Open Market Committee (FOMC) to need to provide support to the economy via numerous rate cuts in 2024.

>> The Takeaway

- Mega-cap names outperformed as investors flocked to these names with strong balance sheets to help reduce risk
- The area of the Treasury curve between the 2- and 10-year fell; the front end of the curve is expected to move lower, toward a more neutral and supportive level, as global growth has started to slow.

Looking Ahead

Retail sales, housing, and consumer confidence will be key points of interest in the week ahead.

- The week kicks off on Wednesday with the release of retail sales data and industrial production reports. Retail sales are set to rise for the second straight month, which would be a good sign for personal consumption and overall economic growth in the fourth quarter. Industrial production is expected to fall modestly, due in part to an anticipated slowdown in manufacturing production.
- On Friday, the preliminary University of Michigan consumer sentiment survey for January and existing home sales for December are anticipated. The first look at consumer sentiment in January is expected to show slightly lower confidence levels. Existing home sales are set to increase modestly, which would mark two consecutive months with rising sales.
